(3) If, however, a strong emphasis lies on the subject, the ipse may remain in the nom., even when the object has an implied notion opposed to it; and, in general, C. is partial to the retention of ipse in nom. HIS, suus (when it relates to the principal substantive of the sentence; i. e., to the definite subject or object of the verb to wch it belongs itself).—ejus. Illius (when it does not relate to the principal substantive of the sentence, and whenever the use of suus would create an ambiguity: thus, accipere cepit columbam in nido suo would leave it doubtful whether the hawk's nest or the dove's was meant: so Sextius. ad eum [Scipionem] filium ejus adduxit, i. e. Scipia's; suum would be ambiguous. Achaë Macedonum regem suspectum habebant pro ejus crudelitāte, L.; but suus is even here used when the sense of the passage sufficiently guards agst the grammatically possible obscurity; cf. Krüger, 407). 1. In a dependent sentence, suus is generally used when the 'his' relates to the subject of the principal sentence, provided it could not be referred to the subject of the dependent sentence itself; e. g. tum ei dormienti ille ille visus est rogare, ut quoniam sibi vivo non subvenisset, mortem suam ne inultam esse pateretur; sis, however, ejus is used in this case (see remark on ejus. illius). and very often ipsius, wch should be regularly used when suus would produce an ambiguity; e. g. Cæsar milites suos incusavit, cur de sua [= militum] virtute, ad de ipsius [= Cæsaris] diligentia desperaret, Cæs. 69. In the case of the acc. with infn., 'is' is allowable, a) if the acc. with infn. does not depend immediately on the verb to whose subject the 'his' refers; e. g. Sciculi me saepe pollicitum esse dicebant—commodis eorum me non defuturum; the acc. and infn. depends immediately on pollicitum esse, not dicebant; β) if the pron. relates not to the subject, but to the object, aranti Q. Cin cinnato nuntiatus est, eum dictatorem esse factum, C.; but here sui is correct and common (Krüger, 411). 2. In dependent clauses with a finite verb, if the verb is in indicative, 'is' is used; if in the subjunctive, suus; tangebant animi domum, quod domum ejus.... reddiderunt nudam atque inanem, where it might be quod domum suam.... reddidissent, if the statement were not made as a fact. These rules, however, are neither of them without exception (Krüger, 411, 412). 3. In co-ordinate clauses (joined by 'but,' 'and,' 'or') 'is' is used; thus, when two subjects are connected by 'and,' the second being referred to the first by 'his,' ejus is used; but if the connection is by cum

C.; sevilita, quam... in sanguine ipse suo exerceret. L. 7, 4. Sis the ipse is in the gen., but this 'does not occur so often as Drakenborch [Liv. 7, 40, 9] thinks' (Z.). when the ref. is to the subject; e.g. suum ipsius caput exsecratur. L. 30, 20, for ipsum. H. party, friends, &c., sui: to render to every man h. due, suum quicque tribuere. — On his part, off, a neg., nec... quidem (e.g. sed nec Jugurtha quidem interea quietus erat, S. Here 'if it is' = 'if it should be found to be': 'should prove to be': si quid habeat, habet, I don't know whether he has *at*h or not: if he will give it, probe that he has, I assert confidently that he will give it. Here the consequence is usually in the future indicative. The English indicative must not mislead us. [Uncertainty with the prospect of decision.]
 (3) If a case, whether possible or impossible, is simply conceived by the mind, the present subjunctive is used: si existat ab inferis Lycurgus, &c. The present subjunctive is also used in the consequence: si enumerare velim, &c. [Uncertainty without any accessory notion.] Here the imperfect subj. is also used in both clauses: seidom, however, in comparison of the present; those tenses having also the office of denoting what would take place, if a certain condition were realized, *wh*ch has not been realized. (4) The condition may be one *wh*ch is not or has not been realized. [Impossibility or belief the thing is not so.] Here the imperf. or pluperf. subj. is used in both clauses, the imperf. subj. being often used in one or both clauses *wh*ere we should in English use the pluperfect. (See Z. § 525.)
 Si with imperf. subj. sts denotes a repeated action, the verb of the principal clause is then in imperf.; si

But if, sin; sin autem; si vero (R5) very rarely; si autem; if not, si not, si non; si minus; si aliter [Z. 343]; if not, nisi, ni (when whole clauses are opposed; si non (merely introduces a negative supposition, the non belonging to the verb: Z. 342); if indeed, si forte quidem; si modo (if only); if by any chance, si forte quidem; si non fortasse; if ever, si quando, si aliquando. [IMPROPR.] Of moral impurity, impurus (g. i. for what is opposed to moral purity: hence also unchaste, of persons and things; e. g. mores. <sup>1625</sup> not used propr. in the best prose).—incestus (unchaste).—(flagitii) iniquatus (stained; hence morally i., of persons or things; with or without flagitii).—spurius (prob. aspirated fm porcus; hence porci. <sup>1625</sup> hence foully impure, g. of persons or things). To lead an i. life, impure atque flagitiose vivere: an i. life, vita parum verecunda; vita libidinibus dedita: i. desires, libidines. [With ref. to style, iniquatus (e. g. of words, C. Opt. Gen. Or. 3, 7).]—non or parum purus (<sup>1625</sup> impurus is not found in this sense, but purus is used several times by Q.).—barbarus (barbarous).—parum or minus Latinus (of impure Latin).

Sen., Q., T., Plin.). to i. it to fear, qd timori assignare: you i. all this to me, hæc tibi a me veniunt. See ASCRIBE.

IN, 1) In answer to where? in what? In with abl. <sup>1625</sup> Since, however, in denotes only a part of the whole space, it is not expressed, but the abl. only used, when the space or place is not considered with ref. to any one part, but as a general specification; thus, he accuses Alexander in one of his letters, epistolā quadam Alexandrum accusat (i. e., the accusation forms the general subject of the letter; C. Off. 2, 15, 53); but, he writes in one of his letters, scribit in literis (= he introduces the mention of this in one of his letters; Cæ. B. G. 5, 49): in the book which I have entitled Hortensius, I have done my best to recommend the study of philosophy, cohortati sumus, ut maxime potuimus, philosophiæ studium eo libro, qui est inscriptus Hortensius (the whole book treats of philosophy; C. de Div. 2, 1, 1): what these are [the duties of justice] has been stated in the preceding book, ea quæ essent, dictum est in libro superiore (in one chapter of it [viz. Bk. 1, chap. 7] C. Off. 2, 13): in Greece, in Græciā: in the whole of Greece, totā Græciā.

—<sup>1625</sup> When a writer is quoted without mention of the particular work, 'in' is translated not by in, but apud [though Q. 9, 4, 18, uses 'in' in this way]; e. g., it is written in Xenophon, apud Xenophontem scriptum est.—<sup>1625</sup> 'In' is also omitted before the names of towns; singular nouns of the first and second decl. being placed in the gen., others in the abl., without any preposition. The names of small islands follow the same rule, those of larger islands take the preposition; Z. 398.—<sup>1625</sup> If extension through a space is denoted, the Latinus use per, as the Greeks and: he had debts in every country, æs alienum per omnes terras.—The other instances in which 'in,' in answer to 'where?' 'in what?' is translated by a simple case, will be found under the verbs after which this occurs.—<sup>1625</sup> It may still be remarked, that 'in' before a substant. is often translated by a present participle; e. g., with a stick in his hand, baculum manu tenens (to stand by with a stick in his hand, cum baculo stare); in the sight of the army, inspectante exercitu: sit by an adj., as, Davus in the play, Davus comicus: or by adv., in earnest, serio; in truth, vere; in abundance, abundanter: or the Latinus choose some other preposition, as, in joke, per jocum; in my presence, coram me. <sup>1625</sup> To have an excellent friend in such a person, to habere qm bonum amicum (bon. amicum in qd habere would be absurd): to have found a courageous friend or foe in aby, qm fortem amicum or inimicum expertum esse (Np.).—<sup>1625</sup> 'In ready money,' 'in gold,' &c., are expressed literally, at least in post-Aug. writers, in pecunia, in auro; cf. Suet. Tib. 49; Galb. 8.

2) In answer to 'whither?' 'into what?' implying not merely rest in a place, but previous motion towards it; in with acc. <sup>1625</sup> With verbs of placing, setting, laying, &c. (ponere, locare, collocare, statuere, constituere), the following rest is principally considered, and 'in' with abl. used (Z. 489): only imponere (when it has not the dat. of the place where) and ponere may take 'in' with acc.: so also deligere (to fix in); de-scribere, inserere (to write or inscribe in); and insculpere (to engrave in) are followed by the acc. with 'in' (or by the dat.).—<sup>1625</sup> Haase ad Reuig., note 573, says that ponere in qd occurs only in the fly. sense in good authors; e. g. in historiam, C.: that imponere in qd loco is very rare (e. g. in equale impositus, Val. Max.); whereas imponere in navem or naves (regularly), in plaustrum, &c. For in ignem posita est (Ter. And. 1, 1, 102), Bentley's Cod. has imposita; but libros in ignem ponere, Sen. de ira, 3, 23. The preposition may also fall away after many verbs compounded with in (e. g. ingredi urbem or in urbem). For these the verbs must be consulted.

3) With ref. to time; a) In answer to 'when?' in with abl. But here too, when the whole time is meant (as it usually is) the prep. is omitted, and the abl. only stands: in the present year, hoc anno; in our times, hæc ætate. When the circumstances of the time, its dangerous character, &c., are to be noted, in is expressed; e. g. in hoc tempore = 'in this critical period,' 'in this time of distress'; so in illo tempore, hoc quidem in tempore: so when 'in time' = 'in good time,' in tempore is used, but in both cases the abl. alone also occurs: Z. 475, note. In descriptions of a man's age, either the abl. only is used, or the participle, agens with the acc. of the time; in his eightieth year, octogesimo anno or octogesimum annum agens (cf. L. 39, 40): if the date refers to his death, either Natus, with acc. of time, is used; or the gen. only, if closely joined with the substant.; e. g. Alexander died in his thirty-fourth year, decessit Alexander annos tres et triginta natus; or Alexander annorum trium et triginta decessit (Z. 397).

b) In answer to 'within what time?' abl. alone, or with in or intra. [Agamemnon ... decem annis unam cepit urbem, Np. Senatus decrevit, ut ... in diebus proximis Italiā decederent, S. Tarracoenæ paucis diebus pervenit, Cæ. omnia commemorabo, quæ inter or intra decem annos nefarie facta sunt, in these last ten years; intra nonum diem opera absolutū sunt, before nine days had expired.]—intra inter (inter marks only the duration of the time that has elapsed whilst a thing was taking place, not the points fm which to which, which is denoted by intra). <sup>1625</sup> In so many days, years, &c., after another event, is variously translated: (I will do something) in eight days fm the date of this letter, octo diebus, quibus has literas dabam; in four days fm his death, quadrius, quo is occisus est; I hope to see him in three days fm the date of this letter, qm triduo quum has dabam literas, expectabam: so for years; tribus annis (or tertio anno) postquam venerat; post tres annos (or annum tertium, quam venerat; tribus annis or tertio anno, quam (or quum, or quo, quibus) venerat.

c) During what time, per (if the whole time is intended; e. g. the stars are visible in the night, per noctem cernuntur sidera: in these last few days, per hos dies, in a negative sentence; e. g. nulla adeo epistola venerat).—inter. intra (within; with ref. to past time

He had made choice of Piso's house, to reside in, Pisonis domum, ubi habitaret, legerat (C.).

With potius one of the objects compared is always actually preferred: magis only attributes a higher degree to one, while both exist; e. g. would he have liked being at Utica m. than being at Rome? an ille Uticæ potius quam Romæ esse maktisset?—ultra, prep. with acc. (denotes excess of measure, relation, &c., e. g. m. than half a pint, ultra hemina: m. than a woman, ultra feminam).—Tham after m. is expressed in Latin after plus and amplius by quam or by the abl.; but with words of number quam is usually omitted; quam is always used aft. magis and potius.—m. than once, sempius (Krebs says that plus quam semel, plus semel do not occur; but they are still found, although prps only in argative sentences, e. g., uterque—non plus quam semel eloquatur, C. Off. 3, 16, 51; Lucullus puer apud patrem nunquam lautum convivium vidi in quo plus semel Græcum vinum daretur, Varr.). The English 'more' in connexion with a subst. or adj. is frequently expressed by a comparative; when a second member of comparison follows, this likewise must be in the comparative: e. g., with m. attention or care, attentius, diligentius: with m. boldness than fortune, fortius quam felicius: with m. heat than caution, calidior quam cautior (cf. Grotf. § 163, Zumpt § 690).—After negatives, a) = further, over and above, amplius, ultra, e. g., I desire nothing m., nihil amplius or ultra flagito: = longer, further, jam: no m. = longer, non jam (C. and L. do not use amplius in this sense with a negative): = I hope no m., non jam, nihil jam spero: no one will say m., say this, hoc jam nemo dicit. Pæt.). To give m., plus dare (m. than another).—amplius dare (to give after one has already given).—supra addere, or simply addere (to give over and above). MUST, s. (New wine), mustum.

MUST, v. is variously expressed, 1) by the participle future passive, to denote obvious necessity: e. g. we m. die, moriendum est: we m. confess that every animal is mortal, omne animal confitendum est esse mortale: the person by whom athg m. happen is expressed by the dative; rarely by a or ab, and that only when a second dative would occasion obscurity: e. g. every one m. use his own judgement, suo cuique iudicio utendum est: you m. consult respecting the property of many citizens, guntur bona multorum civium, quibus a vobis consulendum est (here a vobis on account of quibus, in C. Manil. 2, 6; on the contrary, ib. 22, 64, two datives). If the verb be trans., the object is added in the acc., chiefly by unclass. authors, esp. by Varro; but by class. writers it is changed into the nom., the partic. being in the same gender: e. g. we m. strike into this path, hæc via (nobis) ingredienda est (not hæc viam ingrediendum est): the orator m. regard three points, tria videnda sunt oratori. 2) By oportet (impers. 3rd), to denote necessity wch proceeds from grounds of reason or from the laws of justice, equity, or prudence. (Sis an acc. with an inf. follows: sis a simple subjunct. (esp. if ambiguity is to be avoided); see Zumpt, § 623; Grotef. § 151, obs. 2; e. g. this man m. be bad, hunc hominem oportet esse improbum (I have my reason for believing it to be so): this m. (from internal reasons) and ought on account of external advantage, &c.) to take place, hoc fieri et oportet et opus est: we m. despise nothing in war, nihil in bello oportet contemni: there are things wch one m. not do (ought not to do), even if they are p-mitted, est qd quod non oportet, etiam si licet: he who does not know the way to the sea m. take a river as his guide, viam qui nescit, quâ deveniat ad mare, eum oportet annem sibi querere: you m. love myself, not my property, if we are to be good friends, me ipsum amare oportet, non mea, si veri amici futuri simus. 3) By debere (δέβειν), to specify the necessity wch marks a moral obligation, 'ought', in a subjective sense; e. g. you m. honour him as your own father, eum patris loco colere debet: we were moved by the misery of our allies; what m. we do now under our own sufferings? sociorum miseriâ commovebamur; quid nunc in nostro sanguine facere debemus? Since debere does not differ much from officium, the Latins frequently say for 'a person m.', officium est, and without officium simply est (but with this difference, that cs officium est is = it belongs to a person's obligations, whereas est cs is = it is suitable to any one); e. g. a foreigner m. mind only his own business, peregrini officium est (i. e. peregrinus debet) nihil præter suum negotium agere: a good orator m. have heard and seen much, est boni oratoris (i. e. bonus orator debet) multa auribus accepisse, multa vidisse. This omission of officium is quite common in the expressions, I, thou, you m., meum, tuum, vestrum est. 4) By putare and existimare in rhetorical style, when the speaker courtously declines to anticipate the judgement of the hearer, but leaves it to them to draw their own conclusions; e. g. see to what a pass it m. come with the state, videte quem in locum rempublicam perventuram putatis (C. Rosc. Am. 53, 153; cf. Manil. 9, 26: how many islands m. be abandoned? quam multas existimatis insulas esse desertas? (C. Manil. 11, 32) 5) By opus est (impers. 3rd), to denote subjective need, or that from the doing of wch one expects advantage. It is followed either by the acc. and inf., or, if the person who m. an athg be named, by ut with a subj., or by the abl. of the perf. ptepl. pass.: e. g. if athg take place wch you m. know (i. e. wch it is your advantage to know) I will write, si quid erit, quod te scire opus sit, scribam: I m. wash myself, mihi opus est, ut lavem: I found that I m. look after Hirtius, opus fuit Hirtio convento (cf. Grotef. § 175, b; Zumpt, § 464, Obs. 1). Also, 'm. have or use athg' may be translated by mihi opus est, either impers. with the abl., or pers. with the nom. of that wch one m. have; e. g. we m. have a leader and guide, dux et auctor nobis opus est: we m. use your influence, auctoritate tuâ nobis opus est (cf. Grotef. § 175, a; Zumpt, § 464. 6) By necesse est (impers. 3rd), to denote strict or extreme necessity. It is followed either by an acc. and inf., or by a simple subj.: e. g. the mortal body m. perish some time or other, corpus mortale aliquo tempore perire necesse est: vitæ m. abominare and hate vice, virtus necesse est vitium aspernetur et oderit: man m. die, homini necesse est mori. Also by necesse est we can express our 'm. necessarily have'; e. g. buy not what you want, but what you m. necessarily have, emas non quod opus est, sed quod necesse est. 7) By cogi, to denote necessity arising from the will of voluntary agents: e. g. he found that he m. take away his own life (they forced him to do it), coactus est ut vitâ ipse se privaret: the Campanians found that they m. rush out at the gates, coacti sunt Campani portis egredi. Also the active cogere may be used in expressions such as 'not as he would, but as he found that he m. by the will of the soldiers,' non ut voluit, sed ut militum coegit voluntas. 8) Avoid the use of cogi, with ref. to necessity arising from circumstances. 9) By facere non possum, or simply non possum followed by quin, &c.: or by fieri non potest followed by ut non, &c.; or by non possum non followed by an infin., in the sense of 'not to forbear or abstain from,' of internal necessity; e. g. I m. cry out, non possum, quin exclamem: I m. thank you, non possum, quin tibi gratias agam: I m. have known him, fieri non potest, ut eum non cognoris: I m. confess that my joy is crowned, &c., non possum non confiteri, cumulari me maximo gaudio, quod, &c. 9) Sis there is no occasion for the adoption of any word or phrase distinctly corresponding to our 'must,' e. g. Catulus found that he m. yield to his obstinacy, ejus pertinaciâ cessi Catulus (Np. Han. 1, extr.). 10) Observe, moreover, the following forms of expression in wch the Latin idiom differs from the English: a) You m. (as an emphatic demand, either by the simple imperative or by fac ut, &c.; e. g. if you are not satisfied with this, you m. accuse your own injustice, hæc si vobis non probantur, vestram iniquitatem accusate: you m. keep up good spirits and good hope, magnam fac animam habeas et bonam spem: you m. not (as an emphatic warning), fac, ne, &c. (cause that not, &c.)—cave, ne, &c. (take care, that not, beware of, &c.)—noli, with an infin. (be unwilling); e. g. you m. not wish, cave ne cupias: you m. not forget that you are Cicero, noli te oblivisci Ciceronem esse: you m. not wish for an impossibility, noli id velie, quod fieri non potest. b) If it m. be so (in the future), si res ita feret.

I am quite of that opinion, imo propterea ita censeo: are you then deceiving him? sicine hunc decipis? no! on the contrary, he is cheating me, imo enim vero hic me decipit.* For the English 'no, it is not so, we must not repeat non, and say non, non ita est, we must say only non ita est. *To answer yes or no, aut tiam aut non respondere: the one says yes, the other no, hic ait, ille negat: to say no to athg, negare qd (to deny or negative); abnuere; denegare; negare se qd facturum esse (to refuse).*

NO, NONE, NO ONE, adj. and s. nullus, nemo (usually subst., rarely as an adj. only of persons). *When a gen. is required, we nullus for neminis, nemo does not occur in the best prose, and the adi. nemine occurs only in early and post-Class. Latin; see Zumpt. § 676; Wb. § 226, A. 1; Stürmb. ad C. Arch. 6, p. 96; ad Of. Comment. li.; Kühner ad Cic. Tusc. 5, 22, 63.)—nemo homo (only in C.)—non ullus, non quisquam (none whatever, the former subst., the latter adj.)—no Roman, nemo Romanus (C.)—no writer, nemo scriptor or nullus scriptor (C.)—Stürmb. ad C. Of., refers nemo to quality, and nullus to quantity; so that nemo scriptor = nemo scriptor quascunque est; nullus scriptor = nullus scriptor, quotquot sunt. *When nullus and nemo are used as participles, t. e. when 'no' is opposed to the other parts or to the whole, they frequently take a gen.; e. g. no mortal, nemo mortalium: no animal is wiser, nulla belluarum prudentior est; but for the gen. we may also use a Crcl. with de, ex; e. g. none of ours felt, nemo de nostris cecidit. Nihil is often apparently used for nullus and nemo (with a gen. when for nullus); but there is this difference, that nihil gives emphasis to the negative sense; e. g. none is more unfortunate than I, none more fortunate than Cæsius, nihil me infortunatius, nihil fortunatius est Cæsius: to demand no reward (at all), nihil præmii expetere: to have no doubt (at all), nihil dubitationis habere. We frequently use 'no' when a particular, not a general, idea is to be negated. In this case, weck occurs only when 'no' belongs to a word signifying property, or to the determination of the predicate of a subst., instead of nullus the Latin uses the simple negative non; e. g. I know that I bring no very pleasant intelligence, scio non jucundissimum nuntium use vultu allaturum: *no snow falls on the open sea, nives in alto non cadunt: they had no honey, mel non habebant. In like manner 'no' is expressed in Latin by non when the English object with its verb is denoted in Latin by one verbal expression: e. g. to have no fear, non timere: to have no hesitation, non dubitare: to entertain no hatred towards any one, non odiasse qm, &c. OF, || As a sign of the genitive, or denoting possession is usually expressed by the gen. case in Latin. || Ab with an abl. instead of the gen. is poet., e. g. dulces a fontibus undæ (V.). || Denoting origin, beginning, or cause; we sometimes find e or ex; de: but the prep. is used only for the sake of emphasis or perspicuity; for the most part, 'of' is expressed by the simple genitive; e. g. rex Macedoniæ or

Macedonum, king of Macedon. Sts 'of' is expressed by the use of an adj.; e. g. a citizen of Athens, civis Atheniensis. In the titles of nobility a is better than de; but it is generally best to employ an adj.; e. g. dux Guisui, the Duke of Guise.—To die of a disease, perire a morbo (see Bremi, Np. de Regg. 3, 3); to die of wounds, ex vulneribus perire.—When 'of' refers to the material of wch a thing is made, it is usual not to employ the prep. alone, but to make it dependent on a ptcl., as factus, expressus, or the like; e. g. poculum ex auro, better poculum ex auro factum; or by the use of an adj., poculum aureum. || The prep. must not be used when speaking of things as consisting of a certain material: in this case the material must be denoted by an adj. or by a subst. in the gen. case; e. g. mountains of gold, montes auri, or montes auri. || Denoting the quality or property of a thing. When a property is considered as manifest or apparent, and so as existing according to the mind or judgement of a spectator, the abl. must be employed; e. g. puella pulchra formâ, of a beautiful figure: but when the property is characteristic, and considered as inherent in the subject, then we find the gen. Hence all descriptions of a thing with ref. to its size, weight, age, &c., have the gen.; e. g. pedum quindecim fossa; homo fervidi ingenii; vir magni judicii et summæ facultatis. || In denoting the part of a whole, usually ex, more rarely ab; e. g. nonnulli ab novissimis, some of (Cæs.). || Concerning, respecting, de. What must be thought of those who...? quid de iis existimandum, qui &c.? || Out of, de; ex; inter (among). || Before the name of a town as the native place of a person, 'of' is usually expressed by an adj. of the name of the place instead of a prep.; e. g. Lycurgus of Sparta, Lycurgus Spartanus; Pericles of Athens, Pericles Atheniensis. The prep. with the place is sts, but rarely, used; as L. 1, 50, Turnus ab Ariciâ for Turnus Aricinus.

|| This mode of writing is almost peculiar to L. || Sts 'of' is expressed in Latin by the form of construction; e. g. to smell of a thing, sapere rem: of high birth, natus summo loco: of one's own accord, sponte meâ, tuâ, &c. || The city of Rome, urbs Roma (in appos., not Rome). || The following instances show how to translate 'of' before the participial substantive. (1) By infin.: let no one repent of having preferred, ne quem pœniteat sequi maluisse &c.: I don't despair of there being some one, non despero fore qm. (2) quod with subj.: I think he should repent of having given up his opinion, ego illi, quod de suâ sententiâ decessisset, penitentium censeo: they accused Socrates of corrupting, Socratem accusarunt, quod corrumpet. (3) Instead of reading, he does so and so, quum possit or quum debeat legere (according as the thing not done was a possibility or a duty): why do you cry instead of laughing? cur ridet ac non potius lacrimaris? || MISCELLANEOUS. To ask or enquire of aby, querere qd ex [a, de] qd: to consist of athg, ex qd re constare, consistere; also, of numbers, esse with gen. To be made of athg, ex qd re factum, constitutum esse: one of, unus ex, less qm de.

ON, prep. ¶ (Of place or situation), to the question 'where?' in, with abl., e. g. to place on the table, ponere in mensâ (hæc) not mensam, because the idea of rest is already included in ponere, according to the Roman conception of the word).—super with abl. (of a surface on which a thing is).—ad (near); e. g. ad Tiberim habere hortos, on the Tiber).—In many cases where we think of a thing as at rest, the Romans fix on the previous direction and motion, and hence our 'on' is to be rendered by ex, de, also by a (ab); e. g. on a march or journey; ex itinere (also in itinere; yet with this difference, that in itinere = during the march, ex itinere = from the march, so that it was uninterrupted for some time; see Held, Cæs. B. C. 1, 24): on the right, on the left, a dextra, ab levâ: on the side, a latere: to fight on the walls, de mœnibus pugnare: 'On' is expressed by the abl. alone, a) with substantives of place; e. g. to post armed men on the walls, muris armatos disponere (see Held, Cæs. Observe also the following turns of expression: on the platform, pro rostris; pro suggestu (see Zumpt, § 511): on the spot, e vestigio; statim; confestim (immediately); on the ground, humi (hæc) in humum only in poetry); on all sides, quoquoversus: to hang on a tree, pendere ex arbore: on your authority, tuâ auctoritate; te auctore: on this condition, hæc lege or conditione: to be on any one's side, stare, facere, sentire, esse ab quo. ¶ (Of time), to the question 'when?' by the simple abl.: on the fourth day, quarto die: on the day, die: on the morning, mane: sometimes employ quum; as, on the day that I thanked you, eo die, quum tibi gratias agerem. With a definite term or point of time at which a thing is to take place, ad is used; e. g. to appear on a (fixed) day, ad diem convenire.

ONCE, ¶ An adverb of time, one time, semel: o. one is one, unitas semel posita unitatem facit: o. for all, semel (e. g. ut semel dicam, see Spald. Q. 5, 13, 3): o. more, iterum (of an action repeated).—denovo, de novo (anew, afresh): o. already, semel jam: o., or at least not often, semel aut non saepe certe: more than o., sæpius; plus semel, plus quam semel (hæc) Krœbs says that plus quam semel, plus semel, do not occur; but they do occur, yet perhaps only in negative sentences; e. g. uterque—non plus quam semel eloquetur, C. Off. 3, 16, 51; Lucullus nuper apud patrem nunquam lautum convivium vidit, in quo plus a semel Græcum vinum daretur, Varr. ap. Plin. l. 14; Id ille non plus quam semel usurpare sustinuit, Vell. 2, 40; hæc vice simpliciter (is poet.): o. and again, semel atque iterum (Cæs.); semel iterumque; semel et sæpius (C.); non semel (i. e. not once only): o. a year, semel in anno: not o., non semel; ne semel quidem: at o., repente, subito (suddenly).—simul (at the same time; see L. Ep. 7, 29, etc.): all at o., omnes simul (all together).—omnes universi (all taken together): one at o., singuli, unus post alterum (each one singly, one after the other, with several in succession). At o. may also be expressed by the use of distributive numerals; e. g. not more than three at o., non amplius quam terni: o. for all, semel: but o., never but o., semel adhuc; semel unquam: o. and again, o.—then, semel—iterum; semel—deinde. ¶ As an adverb of time, aliquando and (after the particle ne or si) simply quando (at one time, at some time or other, of time past or future which one does not specify more closely; opp. nunquam)—quondam (o. o. in time past, the nearer definition of which is of no concern; opp. nunc; as, that virtue o. existed in this state, fuit, ista quondam in hac republica virtus).—olim (o., in time past, or in time to come; opp. nunc, nuper: hence the proper word in fables and narratives); if o., si quando, and simply quando quodque (in case that o., &c.).—quum (then, when; see C. Cat. Maj. 10, 34): hæc 'For o. may stay in entreaties, &c.' be translated by obsecro, quæso (pray); put yourself for o. in my place, fac, quæso, qui ego sum, esse te: o. upon a time, olim (hæc) Semel as an adverb of time belongs for the most part, according to Brenz Np. Ath. 15, 2, to the later period).

ONE, adj. ¶ Opp. to two or more, unus (used also for unicus and idem; necessarily in the plural with substantives which have no singular).—unicus (single one, one and no more).—idem (when several actions or circumstances are to be referred to the same subject).—alter (ἄλλος, of things which exist only in pairs; e. g. altera pater claudus): to become one of several, unum filii ex pluribus: I will still observe one thing, unum illud addam: that is not a matter for one man, illud in unum hominis prudentiam cadere non potest (Col. 5, 1, 11): this one thing disturbs me, that &c., me una haec res torquet, quod &c.: the gods have not given every thing to one man, non omnia eidem dii dederunt; in one word, uno verbo (if only one word follows; see C. Phil. 2, 22, 54).—ut paucis dicam (if only a few words follow); in one tenour, continenter (without interruption): ~~non~~ continuo (is wrong),—usque (continually).—uno (in one course): not one, ne unus quidem, non ullus, nemo unus (not even a single one).—non unus, unus et alter item, nonnemo (not one, but several): not one of us, nemo de nobis unus: not one of them, il nulli: never a one, nunquam unus: one and another, unus et alter; unus atqueque (two together).—nonnemo, unus et alter; alter (several): one after the other, alius post alium, alius ex alio, alii super alios, alii atque alius, alius subinde (g. t.).—alter post alterum (of two).—deinceps (in uninterrupted succession, of space, time, and order; it is usually placed between the substantive and predicate or pronoun; e. g. horum deinceps annorum).—continenter (only before and after the class period).—continue (continually, without intermission; not to be confounded with continuo = immediately thereupon without interruption).—The Latin also expresses it by continuo = following one another; e. g. triduum continuo; dies continuos tres; singuli deinceps (each one successively).—alternis (of two, alternately; e. g. alternis [sc. versibus] dicere; alternis versibus contendere); one as well as the other, uterque pariter, ambo pariter (both equally): the one, the other, alter (rarely unus)... alter; hic... ille (this... that)... prior... posterior (the former... the latter): the one (party)... the other, alii... alii... pars (or partim); pars... alii; quidam... alii (the one (party)... the other... others again, alii... alii (or partim)... ut (and thus alii alternately with partim, eight times in C. N. D. 2, 47, 122): one... to the other, or the other (acc.), alter... alteri or alterum (of two)... alius... alii or alium (of several; e. g. one helps the other, alter alterum or alius alium adiuvat).—If however 'other' be connected with a substantive, the substantive is repeated in Latin; e. g. to remove fm one house to another, ex domo in domum migrare: one citizen obeys the other, civis civil pariet: one hand washes the other, manus manum lavat or fricat: one fears the other, timent inter se: happy at one time, unhappy at another, alius beatus, alius miser: the one this... the other that, alius aliquid, alii alia: the one so, the other differently, alius alter: one here, another there, alius alibi: one hither, another thither, alius alio: one time so, another time differently, alius aliunde: both the one party and the other are threatened with dangers, but fm different quarters, alii aliunde est periculum.—If 'one' refer to a substantive previously mentioned, it is rendered by unus (opp. to two or more) or qs (if indefinite); as, there were several elephants there; have you seen one? plures aderant elephantum; num unum vidisti? here are your books; have you read one of them? hic sunt tui libri; num qm ex his legisti?—If by 'one' an individual is emphatically denoted and singled out fm a multitude, unus is used, usually with the preposition ex or de, or the meaning is expressed by a simple ex or inter; as, there was among them one of the Nervians, named Verticus, erat intus unus Nervius, nomine Verticus; Fufus, one of my intimate friends, Fufus, unus ex meis intimis: to command one of the chief leaders of sedition to be taken away, abripi unum inagnum ducem seditionum jubere: the leader himself, one of the most rash and daring, dux ipse inter stolidissimos ferocissimosque. ¶ To denote agreement, concourse, &c., one and the same, unus, idem; Jv. unus atque idem; unus idemque; e. g. at one time (to do several things, &c.); uno or eodem tempore; uno eodemque tempore: it is all one, idem est, par est (see C. Muren. 19, 41): if followed by 'whether... or,' nihil interest utrum... an (see C. Rosc. Am. 41, 120): it is not one and the same thing, to rob and to fight, aliud est rapere, aliud pugnare (L. 1, 12. cf. C. Cat. 3, 6). ¶ If denoting time, and (more rarely) measure, unus is usually omitted, unless an opposition of a greater number be implied; e. g. the matrons mourned for Brutus one whole year, as for a father, matrones annum, ut parentem, Brutum luerunt: not more than one bushel, non plus modio: it seemed to be all one blaze, omnia velut continenti flamma ardere visa (Curt. 3, 8, 18: cf. Hirt. B. G. 8, 15, extr.). ¶ One and a half, unus dimidiatasque; sesquialter. The Latin forms many compounds with sesqui; e. g. a foot and a half, in length, sesquipedalis: an inch and a half, sesquidigitus: a pound and a half in length, sesquidigitalis: a bushel and a half, sesquibollis: a bushel and a half, sesquimodius: an acre and a half, sesquijugum: an hour and a half, sesquihora: a month and a half, sesquimensis: to be a month and a half old, sesquimense esse natu: a day and a half's work, sesquiopera: one year and a half, sex mensium et anni spatium (Georges); unus annus cum dimidio, or et sex menses (Kraff).

ONE, pron. indef. ¶ Denoting an indefinite individual out of a definite number, a ny one, aliquis; unus aliquis (emphatically implying that the individual is only one); e. g. one of you, qs ex vobis: one of the early kings, qs priorum regum: one of yours, unus qs ex tuis: one of the party, vir factionis.—If = a certain one, a definite individual, whom one may not, or will not name; quidam; as, one of the collegues, quidam de collegis.—But if 'one' is = any one, i. e. denotes an indefinite individual out of an indefinite number, we find quispiam, also aliquis; e. g. one may perhaps say, forsitan quispiam dixerit; dixerit hic (poet.); one will prps call me unjust, iniquum me esse; quispiam dicet: one will say prps, dicet qs forte. ~~non~~ After si, nisi, ne, num, quando, ubi, and generally, in conditional propositions, also without the conjunction, quis must be used instead of qs or quispiam; as, if any one has once sworn falsely, qs credit should afterwards be given to him, ubi semel quis pejeraverit, et postea credi non oportet: b) In negative propositions and in such as contain a neg. time sense, (any) 'one' is expressed by quisquam (substantively) and ullus (adjectively); e. g. there are among men any one of whom you think better? estne quisquam omnium mortalium, de quo melius existimes tu? is there one thing of so much worth, or one thing so desirable, that &c., an est ulla res tanti, aut commodum ullum tam expe'diendum, ut &c.; just as good... as (any) one, tam... quam qui maxime; e. g. I am as good a patriot as any one, tam sum amicus republice, quam qui maxime; or by juxta ac (atque) &c.; e. g. instructed in Greek and Roman literature as well as any one, literis Graecis atque Latinis juxta ac doctissimo eruditus (i. e. as the most learned). Since however the pronouns do not express our 'one' in its full extent; we must frequently express the sense by other words or phraseology: a) by the passive; 1) personally; if one is guilty of a fault, si qua culpa committitur: one cannot live happily, except by living virtuously, non potest jucunde vivi, nisi cum virtute vivatur: it is foolish for one to fear what cannot be avoided, stultum est timere id quod vitari non potest; 2) impersonally; one lives, vivitur: evening is coming on; one must go home, jam advesperascit, domum revertendum est; 3) by absolutes absolute; if one assumes this case, hoc posito, a) by the active; 1) the third person singular; e. g. of impersonal active verbs; e. g. one ought, oportet; one may, licet; b) one says, inquit (parenthetically); e. g. it is impossible, says one, that all anger can be eradicated fm the mind, non potest, inquit, omnis ira ex animo tolli. 2) the first person plural, when the speaker includes himself under the unknown subject; e. g. what one wishes one gladly believes, quae volumus, credimus libenter; 3) the second person singular indicative, subjunctive or imperative, in impassioned exhortations, demands, and statements; e. g. one does not see God, yet he may be recognized as God by his works, Deum non vides, tamen ut Deum agnoscas ex operibus ejus. Aliter, the second person singular in the subjunctive, where we say, one can, might, would have; e. g. one might have seen, videres: one would have believed, putares; 4) the particip. present masc. in general propositions; e. g. if one aims at the first place, it is commendable to attain to the second or third only, prima sequentem, honestum est in secundis et tertis consistere. c) If the English 'one' is in Latin the subject of the infn., it is not expressed separately; e. g. humanity requires that one pardon his friend, ignoscere amico humanum est.—But with the infn. esse, and with those verbs which in the passive have two nominatives (of the subject and predicate), as, videri, fieri, existimari, we find, at least, the acc. of the predicate; e. g. the greatest riches, is for one to be contented with his lot, maxime sunt divitiae, contentum suis rebus esse.

ONE ANOTHER, alius alii or alium; of two, alter, alteri or alterum (= one... the other); Inter se, among or between themselves, is used when the predicate is referred only to the personality of a subject of the third person plural, named in the same clause, in the nom. or acc

nasce, rarely in any other. SE inter se is not Latin; see Gernh. C. Lat. 22, 82; Hand, Tursell, 3, p. 387, sq.—inter ipsos (among themselves, when the predicate of a proposition is to be referred to such a subject exclusively, and in opposition to all others; the subject is then mentioned in the same clause, either in the gen., dat., or abl., or in the clause immediately preceding)—mutuo (mutually); VICISIM invicem here would be unclass., vicissim has a different meaning.—ultra et citro, ultra citroque, ultra citro (hither and thither, on both sides). ULTRO CITRO is probably post Aug.; see Hand, Tursell, 2, p. 86, sqq.; they help one a., alter alterum adjuvat; alius alii subsidium ferunt: they keep nothing from one a., nihil quidquam secretum alter ab altero habet: they (two armies) did not observe one a., neutri alteros cernebant: they blamed one a., alius alium increpabant: to love one a., amare inter se; inter se diligere (VICISIM invicem or mutuo diligere not class.: vicissim diligere, formed by the moderns from the misunderstood passage, C. Lat. 9, 30, is wrong): we love one a., amamus inter nos (SE not amamus non inter nos): to look at one a., to fear one a., &c., inter se aspicere, timere, &c.: to strike one a., alter alterum verberibus credit (prop., with cudgels).—inter se confingere (fig., of battle): to be at variance with one a., inter se discordare, dissidere, dissentire: to kiss one a., mutua dare oscula: to kiss and embrace one a., osculari et amplexari inter se (Plaut. Mil. Glor. 5, 40): to render services to one a., officia mutuo respondere: to eat one a., mutua carne inter se vesci: to meet one a., sibi occurrere or obviam fieri: to show kindness to one a., ultra citroque beneficia dare et accipere: to send messengers to one a., nuncios ultra citroque mittere.

ONE-EYED, luscus, cocles (born with one eye).—altero oculo captus or orbis (that has lost one eye).—altero lumine orbis (Plin. 35, 10, 36).—unoculus (g. t. one-e.; mostly in Com. writers). AVOID the later compound monoculus.—unum oculum in mediâ fronte habens; uno oculo in mediâ fronte insignis (having one eye in the middle of the forehead; of the Cyclops).

ONLY, (Denoting limitation or restriction), modo (subjective, denoting that one who speaks or thinks on a matter restricts it in his own mind to a certain case, or within certain limits).—tantum (prop., so much and no more, implies that the term which it qualifies bears the relation of the less to a greater, or of a part to a whole, to which it stands opposed).—solum (o., merely: restricts to a certain case or object, in contradistinction to all others).—tantummodo (o., in so far as; restricts more strongly than tantum or modo, approximating to the meaning of the former, of the latter: AVOID solummodo, which is very rare, and not found at all in the best prose).—non ... nisi (= 'not except under the condition specified': hence not used of numbers). IN the best prose nisi is prefixed to the condition, and the non for which some other negative, neque, nihil, numquam, may stand to the verb; e. g. it is o. by an artist that art can be understood, ars intelligi nisi ab artifice non potest: he dreads o. a witness and a judge, nihil timet nisi testem et iudicem).—dumtaxat (= dum taxat qs, 'strictly speaking', restricting a sentiment by some special reference; often preceded by sed).—nihil aliud quam, quid aliud quam, nihil aliud praterquam (= 'he only &c.', 'he did nothing but &c.', a tense of facere being omitted; e. g. he o. sleeps, nihil aliud quam dormitat: see Zumpt, § 771; but THIS is peculiar to the style of the later historians).—The foregoing words and phrases are used when the restriction relates only to an action or a state; but when 'only' refers to a subject or object which it separates from all others, we find solus or unus, e. g. it is o. man who is endued with reason, solus homo ratione præditus est: I have seen o. yon, te unum vidi: it is o. wisdom that &c., sapientia est una quæ &c.: I o. have seen, ego solum or unus vidi (but, I have o. heard, not seen, it, hæc audivi tantum, non vidi): no o. ... but also, non modo ... sed etiam or verum etiam (proceeding usually from the less to the greater, or from the weaker to the stronger).—non tantum or non tantum modo ... sed etiam (from the greater to the less = 'not only, but even').—non solum ... sed etiam (leaving it undetermined which is the greater).—et ... et (as well ... as).—We find non modo ... sed or verum; non tantum (or tantummodo) ... sed or verum; non solum ... sed (without an et or etiam: the second clause is then the stronger, the other being, as it were, put aside; see Pr. Introduct. II, 504: the second clause may also be strengthened by transposition; e. g. But if the negative is contained in a negative word, such as 'none, never, &c.', then the word nemo, nullus, nihil, numquam, &c., must be retained; e. g. quod non modo Scilicet nemo, sed ne Sicilia quidem tota potuisset; cf. Zumpt § 724, b).—o. in so far, that, dumtaxat hactenus, ut: o. so much, or so far, as, tantum ... quantum (see *C. OPPORTUNITY, opportunitas (v. pr., accidental circumstances of place and time favorable for the completion of an undertaking).—occasio (point of time which unexpectedly and suddenly occurs or presents itself in our favour). Tusc. 2, 24, 58); esse dico ea quæ cerni tangere possunt (C.); Minerva sive Tritonia. We may say that aut distinguishes, vel co-ordinates, sive denotes synonyms, ve is a milder vel. Aut distinguishes things and expressions which are diametrically opposed to each other, or at least are considered as widely different; vel implies that it is indifferent which of several things takes place, or which of several propositions is affirmed; it does not alter whether they be different or alike; vel for the most part distinguishes only single words, more rarely whole clauses; and when it does so it implies only a slight or nominal distinction: sive is used, 1) when, with ref. to one and the same subject, a choice is given between several names and predicates; or 2) when a speaker or writer, himself in doubt or suspense, leaves the choice with the hearer or reader. || In interrogative sentences (whether)... or: utrum... an (or anne or nē)—num... an... nē (enclitic).—an (seid. ne... ne, as Cæs. Hec. 4, 1, 43).—Necne is used mly in indirect questions, and generally without a verb; annon for the most part in direct questions, with or without a verb.
